A little over 100 years ago the Illinois General Assembly passed a piece of legislation called the Downstate Forest Preserve Act. The men who voted for the bill likely had no idea that one of the agencies it would help create would ultimately protect over 25,000 acres for the people of DuPage County or that those 25,000 acres would hold so many remarkable stories.

As many fans of DuPage history know, the county's oldest forest preserve dates back to 1917. Back then it was called Forest Preserve No. 1, but today it's known as York Woods and is the cornerstone of decades of conservation efforts. The original intent of the acquisition, though, as detailed in this issue's article on "Frenchman's Woods," may surprise you.

Four years after the establishment of Forest Preserve No. 1 and a few miles to the south, Francis Stuyvesant Peabody was moving into his new 39-room country home, today's Mayslake Hall. Peabody died on the estate's grounds in 1922 only a year after his mansion's completion, but his passing would later give the property new life in the history books, albeit in chapters on "urban myths." In October you can learn the truth behind many of the legends that continue to surround Mayslake Hall during First Folio Theatre's "Searching for Peabody's Tomb." Details are on Page 12 in the Calendar of Events.

There's also a listing in our fall calendar for guided tours of McDowell Grove that focus on its years as a Civilian Conservation Corps camp. If you're a longtime DuPage County resident like myself, you've probably heard rumors about the "top-secret" radar base that operated out of the old camp in the 1940s. But as "Camp McDowell Goes to War" reveals on Page 17, the forest preserve played an even more clandestine role in our nation's efforts during World War II.

Recently, the Forest Preserve District set up an account on historypin.com, which you can reach from our website, dupageforest.org. It's a communitywide photo-sharing effort that we hope will help us uncover many more important chapters in the interesting story of DuPage County's forest preserves.

DANADA READIES FOR WINTER WITH LOW-CAL HAY

Because of their temperament, the horses at the Danada Equestrian Center in Wheaton are ideal instruction companions for the center's riding programs, but because many of the lessons are for new riders, some of the horses haven't been burning as many calories as others. As a result, a recent review of operations at Danada has reported that the herd is healthy but that some of the horses are overweight.

After consulting with an equine nutritionist, the center has decided to switch to an all-grass blend of hay, which has fewer calories than other blends but still gives horses the roughage and energy they need. Danada's horses eat commercial pellet food daily but rely on hay in winter and fresh grass in summer to supplement their diet.

The center hopes that reconfiguring feeding stations will also help by making it more difficult for horses with bigger appetites to crowd out more timid animals. Staff and volunteers also plan to spread out feedings to four a day to mimic the animals' slower summer grazing habits.

PUBLIC Meetings

Forest Preserve District commission meetings and planning sessions are open to the public and take place at District headquarters at 35580 Naperville Road in Wheaton. Schedules and agendas are available in advance at dupageforest.org. Normally, commission meetings are at 9 a.m. on the first and third Tuesdays of the month, and planning sessions are at 9 a.m. on the second and fourth Tuesdays. At both the board discusses District business and hears public comments as well as staff reports; at commission meetings, the board also votes on agenda items.

2014 Permits

Annual permits for off-leash dog areas, private boats, and model boats and aircraft for 2014 go on sale Monday, Dec. 2, 2013. Camping and picnic reservations for 2014 begin Thursday, Jan. 2, 2014. Call (630) 933-7248, or stop by District headquarters at Danada Forest Preserve in Wheaton. Want a head start on your permit paperwork? Visit dupageforest.org, and click on "Things to Do" and "Permits and Fees" to download and print application forms in advance.

PRESERVE Improvements

The Forest Preserve District is working with a design firm on plans for water and sewer improvements at St. James Farm Forest Preserve in Warrenville. The $2,700,000 project is part of the first phase of the forest preserve's master plan, which the District's Board of Commissioners approved in 2010. The improvements will bring drinking water, sanitary sewers and fire-suppression systems to the preserve, which will allow the future development of the main and east farm areas. The District expects work to begin in late 2014.

The District has also recently selected an engineering design firm to draft plans for a bridge that will cross County Farm Road in Hanover Park and connect Mallard Lake and Hawk Hollow forest preserves. The bridge and a mile of new trails will link sections of the North Central DuPage Regional Trail that run through both preserves. The District expects to break ground on the $3,500,000 project in late 2014 or early 2015.

PIN THE PICTURE ON THE PRESERVE

The Forest Preserve District is now on historypin.com, a site that's dedicated to bringing people together within communities and around the world to share their stories about the places they call home. Now, forest preserve fans can not only view photos and videos from the District's archives but also add to the collection by pinning their own historical forest preserve images to a map of DuPage County. You can link to the District's account from the home page of dupageforest.org. There's also a mobile app that allows you to superimpose historical photos from the website over real-time screen shots when you're visiting a pinned preserve.

NATURE: Got Your Daily Dose?

© Amy Goldstein

Even if you're not a parent, you're likely familiar with the claim that kids today are getting too much "screen" time and not enough "green" time. It's a syndrome author Richard Louv has called "nature-deficit disorder."

But what about those of us in the "over 21" crowd? Should we care how long it's been since we walked along a tree-lined trail or looked at never-ending prairie instead of pavement? Well the studies are in, and survey says — yes. Absolutely.

If you guessed how most people would answer, "Would you rather look at forests or freeways?" you'd likely be right. But why do we prefer natural landscapes over manmade ones, and does the reason matter? Researchers worldwide — biologists, psychologists, ecologists — have been trying to put their collective finger on the answers for some time.

In one study, people reported how mentally fatigued they were before and after one of three activities: walking in an urban area, walking in a natural environment or sitting in a comfy chair. Couch potatoes everywhere were stunned to read that the participants who took walks in the park reported the greatest increases in stamina when they were done. Research has even suggested that the more stressed people are the more relaxed they feel after spending time outdoors.

There have been more quantitative studies, too, that have looked at blood chemistry, brain activity and other physiological attributes. One showed that blood pressure, heart rate and levels of stress hormones decreased more after a walk in the woods than after a walk down a city street. Another measured blood pressure and nerve activity during simulated drives to see if merely driving through a natural setting had any effects. (Spoiler Alert: Drivers not only relaxed more quickly during their virtual travels through leafy landscapes but were also less likely to get stressed out later.)

So does this mean we're getting more out of nature than some nice-looking scenery? Richard Louv thinks so. As he explains in "The Nature Principle," "Nature has a direct positive impact on human health ... And many of us, without having a name for it, are using the nature tonic. We are, in essence, self-medicating with an inexpensive

“Nature has a direct positive impact on human health ... And many of us, without having a name for it, are using the nature tonic.” — Richard Louv and unusually convenient drug substitute. Let’s call it vitamin N — for Nature.”

The idea of a revitalizing “vitamin N” isn’t new, though. In the late 1800s Frederick Law Olmsted, whom many consider the father of landscape architecture in the U.S., was touting nature’s ability to operate “by unconscious processes to relax and relieve tensions created by the artificial surroundings of urban life.” He applied this belief to the parks he designed by allowing the natural scenery, when possible, to speak for itself, a principle that landscape architects at the Forest Preserve District of DuPage County use today.

Decades after Olmsted, social scientists were beginning to study the effects of “vitamin G,” for green space, on people’s health and wellbeing, and psychologists were going toe-to-toe with Gordon Gekko with papers that supported the idea that “green is good.” But as researchers were agreeing that nature had a positive effect on people, theorists were asking why. Some suggested that after eons of being surrounded by nothing but trees, flowers and water, we’d become genetically linked to these environments. Biologist Edward O. Wilson called it “biophilia,” or “the connections that human beings subconsciously seek with the rest of life.” For like-minded thinkers, the answer to the question, “Why do people respond well to nature?” was simple. We’re hardwired to do so.

Fortunately, whether you call it vitamin G or N or even vitamin O (for the great outdoors!) easy-to-swallow doses are no more than a 10-minute drive from any home or business in DuPage County.

Roughly 90 percent of the land in DuPage County’s forest preserves remains in a natural state, and thousands of acres have been restored to pre-agricultural-looking savannas, prairies and wetlands. Dozens of miles of trails carry visitors through these habitats, many without any manmade features in sight other than the trails themselves. Herrick Lake in Wheaton, Maple Grove in Downers Grove and Waterfall Glen in Darien all have stretches where you can walk or bike without spotting a single power line or water tower on the horizon.

If you’re interested in a quicker fix, parking lots at Mallard Lake in Hanover Park, Wood Dale Grove in Addison and Pratt’s Wayne Woods in Wayne are just yards away from picnic tables and benches that overlook sparkling lakeshores on sunny days. And a short walk from the lot near Graue Mill at Fullersburg Woods in Oak Brook offers the sites of Salt Creek as well as the pleasing sounds of water rushing over the nearby dam.

So if we as grown-ups are not spending enough time outside, what’s holding us back? That’s one of the questions research hasn’t been able to answer. Do we have a lack of encouragement? Some physicians are already “prescribing” short hikes through nearby parks — trail maps included. Are we blaming the weather? Even after not-so-pleasant walks in blustery, cold conditions — we’re talking Canadian cold — people’s short-term memory and attention levels still improve.

In the end, whether from studies or instinct the message is clear. Now and again we all need a healthy dose of DuPage County’s forest preserves. Get yours today. You’ll be happy you did. •

Camp McDowell Goes to War

by CHRIS GINGRICH, OFFICE OF EDUCATION

If you're into DuPage County history, you've likely come across stories about a secret camp that operated at McDowell Grove Forest Preserve in Naperville during World War II. The people stationed there were learning a new technology called radar, and by some reports, the installation was one of the largest of its kind in the world. But recent research on McDowell Grove and its wartime activities has further unraveled the truth behind the legend — and revealed a part of the camp's past that you may never have heard.

There was a radar school at “Camp McDowell” between 1942 and 1943, but radar was not entirely new technology. Before World War II even began, researchers around the world had been working on the detection system. Radar was invaluable to Great Britain in defeating the German air force during the Battle of Britain in 1940, and U.S. military personnel were in England learning about radar systems prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941.

As the threat of war loomed, though, the military enlisted the help of engineering and technical schools to expand its radar training efforts. Several Chicago institutions offered classes for military personnel and for civilians who agreed to enlist after graduation. The programs were affiliated with the Navy as well as the Army Signal Corps, the branch that to this day develops and manages communications for the armed forces. One such radar school was at the Illinois Institute of Technology, which boasted

“the largest and most advanced Signal Corps pre-radar program in the Sixth Service Command.”

At Camp McDowell, civilian students practiced what they had learned in school by working on radar equipment. Stories over the years have said that the camp housed advanced systems, but several veterans recalled working on older units. One trainee stated that the camp had just a single piece of radar equipment. Newer devices, it seems, were solely for active-duty personnel at other camps.

Security at the radar school was top priority. Instructors locked up text books and manuals after every class, and cameras were strictly prohibited. But secrecy — who knew what about the school — seems to have been a lesser concern.

For most of the time that the radar school was in operation, the remainder of McDowell Grove Forest Preserve — its picnic grounds and fishing holes — was open to the public, so visitors and neighbors alike knew about the school's existence. One civilian guard who lived next door did describe buildings with false fronts that lowered under cover of darkness to expose equipment hidden within, but former students did not recall such decoys. To further cast doubt on the level of secrecy, hometown papers at the time were reporting on students who were attending or had just finished their studies at “the Chicago Radar School at Camp McDowell, Naperville, Illinois.”

If details regarding the radar school seem inconsistent, they’re practically nonexistent about the next — and perhaps more intriguing — chapter of the Camp McDowell story, the arrival of the U.S. Office of Strategic Services.

Three months before the radar school closed, the Forest Preserve District of DuPage County received a letter from Dr. George Claridge, a professor of astronomy and electrical engineering who left Harvard University to direct the school. In his letter, Claridge asked “for specific permission to prohibit the public from using McDowell Grove. The movement of any individual in the neighborhood of the Camp is liable to put suspicion on the part of the Guards of Camp McDowell; and in order to forestall any incident which may involve misunderstanding, and even shooting.” Claridge also requested permission “to use the first Island for handgrenade [sic] instruction, obstacle races and military drill.”

The District approved Claridge’s request and made the entire forest preserve off-limits to the public. Three months later, the OSS was at Camp McDowell.

As America’s wartime intelligence agency and the predecessor of the CIA, the OSS needed operatives who could not only complete daring covert missions but also communicate in the field, including behind enemy lines. The OSS operated a communications training school known as “Area C” in Virginia. As part of their training, recruits sent messages to a radio station on Mackinac Island in Michigan known as “Area M.” But when the OSS needed more space to accommodate its growing number of recruits, it decided to move Area M and sent a communique stating that staff would be “instructed on what day to start the movement of their equipment to Camp McDowell.”

Communications training required expert instructors, and the OSS Camp McDowell program was led by Eugene Hubbell, a highly skilled operator who had managed radio communications for the Rockford police department. (In 1936 Hubbell had won an amateur Morse code radio contest with a rate of 52.2 words per minute.)

Naperville resident Madeline Drendel also worked at Camp McDowell, first with the radar facility and then with the OSS. In the unpublished memoir that she wrote for her family, she offered some insight into how personnel were to respond to questions about the clandestine camp.

“We were Detachment M,” she recalled. “Employees were to say they worked for a radar school.”

There were several hundred men with the OSS at Camp McDowell. It was a diverse group of trainees that included some “Nisei,” second-generation Japanese-Americans, who were recruited from the 442nd Regimental Combat Team, a unit comprised entirely of soldiers of Japanese descent. Many were volunteers who had relatives in U.S. internment camps or who had lived in the camps themselves.

For the OSS, the 442nd was an ◀ Eugene Hubbell was in charge of the OSS radio training program at Camp McDowell. Recruits learned to use double transposition ciphers like this one from "Area M" to encrypt messages using Morse code.

ideal place to recruit men with Japanese language skills, including Camp McDowell's Joe Tobari, who recalled, "They asked for volunteers for a special group and I got in and they told me it was going to be a highly dangerous mission."

Dick Hamada also trained at Camp McDowell. "On December 29, 1943 the group left Camp Shelby [Mississippi] under the cloak of darkness. Traveling by Pullman, we arrived [at] Camp McDowell, Naperville, Ill. on January 3, 1944." Once at the camp, Hamada underwent long hours of instruction on Morse code, eventually learning to transmit and receive 15 to 18 words per minute.

The OSS period at Camp McDowell and the recruits who trained there may explain some of the rumors that started to circulate about the camp. Security was tightened before the radar school closed, and because the OSS used the school as cover for its own activities, civilians living near the camp were likely not aware that it was operating under new management. Some speculated that the area had become a prisoner of war camp because so many of the personnel there spoke other languages. As OSS veteran Dick Beltz recalls, "It seems most of the students there were foreigners who didn't speak much English."

The exact number of OSS recruits who received training at Area M is unknown, but the need for the facility seems to have waned by 1944. Madeline Drendel, who turned down opportunities to transfer, separated from the OSS on May 22 of that year due to a "reduction in force" and "the closing of the project at Camp McDowell." By then, Dick Hamada had joined OSS Detachment 101, which fought behind enemy lines alongside the Kachin people against the Japanese in Burma. Eugene Hubbell went to Africa and Europe, where he established and maintained communication networks for the OSS, and Joe Tobari, who suffered a knee injury while at Camp McDowell, returned to the 442nd following his recuperation and served in Italy.

After the war ended in 1945, McDowell Grove Forest Preserve again opened to the public, and by 1946 the Forest Preserve District was accepting bids from parties who were willing to purchase and remove barracks and buildings from the old radar school. If secrecy was the goal, the OSS certainly achieved it during its time at Camp McDowell, but the legend and lore it also created will remain with this forest preserve for years to come. •

Frenchman's Woods

It was DuPage County's first forest preserve, and the county bought it to build a road.

By today's standards, it wasn't one of the more conservation-minded reasons to preserve over 70 acres, but it was 1917, and DuPage County was in its infancy. As the Chicago Daily Tribune reported, "commissioners of DuPage county, the road supervisors and the public spirited citizens" were "deeply interested in the project" to extend 12th Street from Chicago so motorists would have "a direct thirty mile drive without a turn through the southern edge of Wheaton."

Since then, 12th Street has been renamed Roosevelt Road, and that first acquisition, which early records referred to as "Forest Preserve No. 1," has become York Woods Forest Preserve in Oak Brook.

At 70 acres, what York Woods may lack in size it makes up for in history and location. About 40 acres of the initial 1917 purchase belonged to the Torode family. Nicholas Torode had first bought land in DuPage in 1835. A native of the Guernsey Islands, a French-speaking possession of the English Crown, Torode wanted his sons to have the right to vote and to inherit his property, so he moved his family to the United States, first to Ohio and then Illinois.

Torode became one of the earliest European settlers of York Township and one of the first to quarry limestone, which was literally the foundation for a growing county. He was so well-known that many in the area who assumed he came from part of France started calling the land around his property "Frenchman's Woods."

In 1845 his limestone went into a sawmill he later owned on Salt Creek. (The mill burned down in 1848, but four years later the waterwheel on Frederick Graue's gristmill, which still stands today, was churning away along the same stretch of the creek.) The stone also went into Torode's own 10-room family home, which remained standing until the 1960s when the state razed the building to make way for the Tri-State Tollway.

Today, York Woods Forest Preserve stands in the southwest corner of the intersection of Roosevelt and York roads, which makes it a convenient green venue for visitors from the concentrated businesses, shopping centers and neighborhoods in this part of the county. Reaching the forest preserve from the south requires an extra bit of navigation, though. Traffic on northbound York cannot turn left onto Frontage Road, so drivers have to go to the interchange at Roosevelt and follow the signs back to southbound York.

The picnic grove at the parking lot on Frontage Road is one of the county's oldest. On weekdays it's not uncommon to see lanyard-draped office workers spending their lunch hours at this part of the preserve. The 100-person picnic shelter — a Civilian Conservation Corp original from the 1930s — is surrounded by 3 acres of mowed grass dotted with picnic tables and shade trees. Groups can reserve the shelter through Visitor Services at (630) 933-7248 but must do so at least three business days before their visit. Trail users can make impromptu stops at the smaller shelter to the northwest, which is available on a first-come first-served basis.

York Woods' location also makes it a key link in the recently completed Salt Creek Greenway Trail, a 32-mile, multiagency trail that connects Busse Woods Forest Preserve in Elk Grove Village to Brookfield Zoo in Brookfield with access to the Illinois Prairie Path along the way.

But for years, devoted regulars have taken to York Woods

▲ Old-field goldenrod (Solidago nemoralis)

▲ Heath aster (Aster ericoides)

▲ Smooth sumac (Rhus glabra)

for the sake of its own trails, some of the few in the forest preserves that remain asphalt. Stretches along the mile-long loop are lined on either side with trees that arch overhead forming leafy awnings. It's perhaps these century-old stands of bur and white oaks that make these woods such a sanctuary for frenzies of chickadees, downy woodpeckers, great horned owls, indigo buntings and white-breasted nuthatches. Because the woods are so heavy with oaks, the skies fill with browns and auburns this time of year instead of maples' more vivid yellows and oranges, but on gusty days, the wind through the large drying leaves can drown out the heaviest traffic on the surrounding roadways.

Around the trunks of many of these trees, the leaves on Virginia creepers are turning mauve, red and purple. This vine looks similar to poison ivy, which becomes scarlet in fall. Even the narrow serrated leaves that cover the crooked branches of smooth sumacs are turning crimson, a fitting complement to the shrubs' stiff cones of bright reddish orange berries that remain throughout winter.

But several species of plants are still in bloom. Fall, after all, is showtime for Ontario, New England, heath and other blue-, white- or purple-petaled asters and for Canada, old-field and grass-leaved goldenrods, just to name a few, which yield some of the season's brightest yellows.

Even in the small wetland along the south side of the Salt Creek Greenway Trail, autumn is settling in with dozens of species of sedges drying next to stands of spent cattails. Soon, the few lingering red-winged blackbirds will start their southbound journeys for their winter homes.

It's fall in York Woods and the perfect time to explore a DuPage forest preserve first. •
